Aja Tibbs, left, and Jolie Diepenhorst, right, share examples of the process Brighton Historic Preservation Commissioners would through to consider requests to modify properties in a historic district. A downtown historic district is proposed and will be considered by the Commission on Nov. 9. Participants at the Wednesday public meeting voted on whether or not they would approve proposals. Tibbs is the city's long-range and historic preservation planner and Diepenhorst is Historic Preservation office coordinator.

City Council hosts telephone town hall

Brighton residents will have the opportunity to discuss services, ask questions, and provide input on Brighton's future during a telephone town hall meeting with the Brighton City Council and department directors from 6-7 p.m. on Nov. 2.

Randomly selected city residents will be called directly to encourage their participation in the telephone town hall. Residents also can dial the toll-free number, 1-855-312-2107, to join the call. Residents who would like to be added to the call list can register their number at brightonco.gov/tth.

Participants can engage council members and staffers with questions, or just listen to the conversation while taking part in poll questions.
